Hindi movie gaane wali deewan mp3DARPA funding has made it possible for Google and several other tech firms to manufacture gigafactory-scale rare earth elements. You should be worried. The hidden dangers of the rare earth element shortage As a country, the United States is often overlooked when it comes to technological advancement — but when things come together, and one sees the first fruits of technological growth, then a process of inertia really sets in, and we all tend to assume it's going to be here for ever. The rare earth element, neodymium, was not in that camp. Up until very recently, the rare earth element was one of those elements, which when needed, could be extracted from the earth's crust, and its price would fluctuate accordingly — from about $30 a kg back in 1980, to $13000 a kg today. Rare earth elements are used in the manufacture of batteries for automobiles, wind turbines, and even your microwave oven (though in much larger quantities). They are a necessary element in any modern industrialised nation, but, since the early 2000s, they have become much more difficult to find, with most countries
