After the unveiling of the Oculus Quest in April, it appears that the headset is actually on the chopping block for the company. In a new job posting, it's clear that Oculus is looking to hire an Engineer who wants to be part of the Oculus Connect team — the company that creates VR products. Oculus Connect is a twice-yearly developer conference in San Jose, California, where the company shows off its latest software and hardware for VR and AR (such as tracking its Touch Controllers, and Quest). Oculus already reported that this year's Connect will be streamed and watched by more than 1 million people, and if that number continues to grow, Oculus may need to revamp its team. The Oculus Engineer who is interested in being part of Oculus Connect is looking for someone who "excels at contributing to large team projects and is comfortable collaborating with a variety of other engineers and executives." That's a pretty big part of the role, so it's unclear if the Oculus Engineer will be a one-person show, or if there will be additional help. Oculus Quest is currently available for preorder, as is the company's second-generation headset, the Oculus Go. It's also clear that the company is preparing for a 2018 launch for that headset, since that's when Quest's availability begins. Oculus is also planning a standalone unit that's being made in partnership with Samsung: that hardware is expected for next year, as well. With all of this competition, it's probably good that Oculus is finding new ways to attract talent. Today, The Jetsons and The Jetsons' Jetson family may seem somewhat anachronistic. But the futuristic world of the cartoon was a stark description of where in the United States many families lived in the late 1960s when the show was broadcast on the NBC network. That world never existed, of course. But to see what it would have looked like, let's take a trip back in time. The Jetsons 79a2804d6b
