I asked the committee to focus on a project I had been wrestling with for some time: what is the best way to implement "Web Services" into the digital steno environment, to enable web-based data access from digital steno devices, and also to allow web-based documents to be shared across devices? This prompted a response from a colleague, who suggested I address the following in a paper: 1. Web Services today, 2. Understanding web service standards, and 3. web service security. The idea of web services was first mentioned in the late 1990s. One of the early proponents was Microsoft, which had a clear vision of a business process platform based on standards that would allow disparate applications and systems to communicate using the Internet, and using XML to represent messages. The premise was that people would not need to learn new tools and languages. They could just use their browsers to access services. The REST initiative has been highly visible in recent years. The Web Services Description Language (WSDL), initially developed by Microsoft, is a language used by SOAP (WSDL is part of SOAP) in the web. WSDL is used as an abstraction mechanism that provides a common way to describe the interfaces and messages of various web-based services. This is highly successful. You almost never need to understand the underlying details of a web service. You just choose a URI (Uniform Resource Identifier) and use the API (Application Programming Interface), which is done in most modern languages via a ".Net" library. The.Net implementation in JAVA is very good. The REST architecture has been adopted in many places, and has become very successful. Today, the Web represents 85% of all Internet traffic, and sites accessing the Internet will generally use REST protocols over HTTP. REST has replaced old-fashioned SOAP as the 04aeff104c
