Morphogenetic potentiality of ectopic endoderm associated with ventral-lateral wall of the gastrula of urochordates. In the sea urchin early gastrula, a ventral endodermal region has been shown to acquire ectopic dorsal fate when placed dorsally to the vegetal plate. I show here that in the Urochordata a similar ability is found in the ventral wall of the animal hemisphere of gastrula, where endoderm can differentiate into mesoderm and ectoderm. Gastrula which consists of dorsal and ventral wall of the animal hemisphere with ectoderm covered with a cup, appeared in the wall of gastrula of Pleurobrachia pileus and Brissus latissimus. Morphogenetic movements of the endoderm associated with the cup were mainly observed at the bottom of the cup. The transient and lateral migration of the endodermal tissue associated with the cup showed both gastrulation movements and convergence-extension movements of the endoderm in the cup. Ectopic endodermal expression of Hox gene, Pedom, was identified at the border between the cup and the vegetal plate. These results indicate that the ventral wall of the animal hemisphere (embryonic endoderm) of gastrula is capable of producing mesoderm and ectoderm by the mechanical movement of its own endoderm. This endoderm movement in the endoderm associated with the cup could provide more evidence for the hypothesis that ventral-lateral wall of gastrula is the potential source of ectoderm and mesoderm in the sea urchin embryos.  For the full copyright and license information, please view the LICENSE * file that was distributed with this source code. */ Tests for the PHP_Token class.  @package
