Binary. Google Patent Described

Quantum Computing Technology

Google has patented an invention that could eventually be used for quantum computing, perhaps even faster than theoretically possible. Yes, Google is apparently working on a quantum computer. What is a quantum computer and why is it important? A quantum computer would allow a single query to the database to retrieve numerous results. For example, if Google patented this quantum computing technology, it could allow the search engine to search for cat results and show you various cats. It could also find creative ways to show the same cat in a variety of colors.

Meanwhile, a classical computer only holds one solution at a time.

A quantum computer contains the answer to a problem and then generates a handful of probabilities. Google has patented the technology, which it describes as a form of quantum computing without the cooling. This computer can be used to search a database for different solutions at the same time. It might also be able to pinpoint any subtle or complex relationship between two words, such as "lightning" and "storm." What is the patent description of quantum computing? The patent is rather vague but reads as follows: "An apparatus and method for 79a2804d6b
