Perform a complete system backup before you try to restore your data from another hard drive. System restore will only recover the files you had on your computer before the backup. Any additional data that was added after the backup will be unrecoverable.As you know, the FAA has issued their proposed changes to the current Code of Federal Regulations (CFR) rules governing the use of drones. The UAS community has been fighting for their place in the aviation industry for several years, and it's about to get a little easier to operate. The FAA's proposed changes provide a number of benefits to the UAS industry including (1) removing a general ban on operating UAS in Class A airspace, (2) allowing operation of small UAS in Class G airspace without an approved waiver, and (3) allowing for the enforcement of commercial UAS operations on private lands (i.e. the FAA will not need a waiver to enforce operations on private lands). Notably absent, however, is any mention of the UAS industry being allowed to operate under Part 107 of the CFR, which currently governs the rules regarding "Low Altitude Flight." There are several reasons why the UAS community has fought for their current exemption, which is due to expire on October 24, 2016. Among these reasons: 1. A Part 107 exemption for the UAS industry would make sense because: (1) they have similar operating capabilities as manned aircraft; (2) they are not considered a threat to manned aviation; and (3) they have never caused a single accident or incident during their time in the industry. 2. FAA was notified of drone regulations changes in mid-June and did not comment or provide any public awareness until the end of August. They have had enough time to review the legislation and provide the proper public notice to the UAS community. 3. UAS operators have received the FAA's final rule a few months ago and have had enough time to make use of the rule or appeal the rule. 4. The UAS community has been in the aviation industry for many years and is far more equipped
