Which data type is more or less common? char, unsigned char, and std::string? A: There is no universal answer. Performance depends on the functions used and your code. But char is faster than unsigned char (which is faster than string) because char is smaller and thus it is faster to access it. On a memory pointer level, if you have: unsigned long a = 0xdeadbeef; Then the address of 'a' can be immediately calculated long long* ap = &a; unsigned long long* up = &a; long long* lp = &a; unsigned long long* ulp = &a; unsigned long long is larger than unsigned long and thus the compiler will choose unsigned long long on the first choice. A: char, unsigned char and std::string are all of equivalent size on most implementations: 32 or 64 bits. However, char is most commonly implemented as a single byte, while unsigned char is usually 8 bits. So char is most likely to be faster than unsigned char on most implementations, and likewise for std::string vs. char. A: long and unsigned long will be faster. char, unsigned char, and std::string are all the same in size, if you have a 32-bit system that is a little more effective to use std::string. I suggest you just to chose the type that's the easiest to maintain. can't do it. "There are so many, so many, so many things that people know about the Pittsburgh Steelers, so many things that I might believe," Ike Taylor said. "I have to do it for myself because I have to know, because I need to protect myself. I need to know if I'm right, if I'm wrong. I have to do it. "You guys are going to look at me as a moron. I'll look at you as a moron as well because
