This latest release has many updates, and some of them have caught my attention more than others. The Lens Correction filter allows users to apply lens distortion corrections that look quite natural in their output. A Filter Layer function allows you to apply sharpening and noise removal to a selected portion of the image. Then a new Adobe Print function will allow you to print a file directly from Photoshop. Some people may not understand the use of this function—until you print a file from Lightroom and then find that the machine didn't print all the images in the document. In that case, you will have to reprint in Photoshop. This new program also includes a new layer context menu that enables you to create a selection at the intersection of two separate layers. This allows you to remove just the part of an image that you want.
