California Noxious Weed Control Act The California Noxious Weed Control Act (commonly known as the "Hitch Act") is a California statute which regulates the use and abuse of chemical herbicides in some California counties. The Act was passed in 1999 and became effective on January 1, 2000. Section 4, Title 2, of the Act deals with the regulation of herbicides. Overview A county is able to adopt the Act if it is a county of less than 25,000 square miles in which more than 1,000 acres of the county is covered by an intercounty ditch, or in which more than 1,000 acres of the county is covered by a state trunk water line. To be eligible for the Act, a county must not have an ordinance which deals with the regulation of toxic substances as defined in this Act. This Act is to protect residents and the agricultural industry from chemicals which may be harmful. The bill is not a ban on the use of herbicides, but rather a regulation of their use. The bill is designed to protect those who may accidentally ingest the chemicals used, as well as the crops. Specific questions are to be asked of an applicator, such as if the application is for a residential use, and how the chemical will be disposed of. The Act defines noxious weed as "any plant species that is or is perceived to be injurious or potentially injurious to humans, horses, livestock, wildlife, or other animals or agricultural crops or to vegetation in general."
