The clipping mask tool is often useful for manipulating layers, but it's not the best way to do it. For example, sometimes you may need to remove a photo layer from another layer. The only way to do that is to U-click and drag, which means losing any adjustments you've made to that layer. A better alternative is to create a new layer with the "Create Clipping Mask" option under the Layer menu. That way you can make any adjustments to the new layer, without impacting the layer that was clipped first. For details, check out the Photoshop scripting manual.

Well, as I mention above, I love Lightroom. At the same time, I've been thinking for some time about how to make it easier to navigate different catalogs and albums on my computer. After starting to demo version 4 of Lightroom, I immediately realized that the current search functionality is not something that I've ever found myself using. While it might be perfect for purging pics of old trips and vacations, it's not geared toward photo discovery and catalog management. Hopefully Lightroom 5 will be a step in that direction.

The changes in version 4 were a benefit to both Lightroom and Photoshop. The live mask placeholder was an easy place to start. I am especially fond of the object selection tool. It's fast, simple and intuitive to use. It's a drag-and-drop operation, and that's a big improvement over the old way of operating - selecting objects by highlighting them in yellow. The object selection tool is a great fit for the "advanced" operations, for which the old menu-based method could sometimes prove to be too much of a barrier. I wouldn't say that the new version is as important as the old, but it does offer some improvement, especially for the more adventurous users.
