Now, as far as processing power, due to Adobe Photoshop's abilities to process images without a noticeable slowdown, this method of photo editing is well suited to higher-end and high-volume computers because of the large number of layers, brushes and the massive size of the files they produce. About 25% of your computer's memory, or RAM, is swapped automatically when Photoshop runs, so you can't increase RAM until the swap file needs more room to run the process properly. This should not be a problem for most people running these programs because the stock settings are still very optimized and with few tweaks, you can significantly speed up Photoshop's performance.

Of course they come with all the same software - the one thing that separates these programs apart is that they do different things. Photoshop is the powerhouse of the two and is widely used for retouching, photo editing, web design and fine art graphics. It's also the program that professional photographers use to create print layouts.

Now, I've just shown you Photoshop Camera, which is my favorite tool for creating videos. I also use Photoshop to create videos for other services like YouTube. With lightroom, I edit them afterwards. While we're on the same subject, I had a look at the set up options for Lightroom. One of the most important ones is the saving settings. I had to automate a lot of work for myself, and I share these tips and tricks with you.

The most important feature in Lightroom is the smart collection, which automatically organizes your images automatically. This is one time every year. You can change the ID or even the name directly from the Collection page.
